City Launches Community Development Plan

A new document intended to provide a blueprint for the social and cultural development of the City of Rockingham until 2012, has been launched by Rockingham Council.

The Community Development Plan is designed to influence the way the local government interacts with the Rockingham community by assessing and managing needs, helping communities become self-reliant and developing places for the community.

“With growth comes change and with change comes increased needs in terms of infrastructure and social and cultural programs and this is why the Community Development Plan is such a valuable document for the City of Rockingham,” said Rockingham Mayor Barry Sammels.

“A key strategy of the plan is to encourage the community, business and government to work together as one coherent partnership”, he added.

The Community Development Plan is built around a five-point plan, which focuses on personal development, infrastructure development, community participation, place activation and relationships between residents, community groups, government and local businesses.
